

Barbara Tuffli is an award-winning photographer, horticulturist, and floral designer whose photographs appear in exhibits and on the covers of national publications. In 2013 she was honored to have her photographs of her garden, Camellia Hedges, added to the Smithsonian Institution's Archives of American Gardens.

Barbara is a former chairman of the GCA Horticulture Committee, and former president of the American Camellia Society. She currently serves as a Horticulture Judge for both organizations. She is a member of the Woodside-Atherton Garden Club, the American Camellia Society, and the International Camellia Society.

She inherited her lifelong interest in gardening and design from her parents along with their Atherton, California garden with its extensive collection of camellias. Over the last 38 years, she has significantly expanded the camellia collection to over five hundred cultivars, adding more reticulatas along with other interesting camellia species. Barbara studied landscape architecture at the University of California and has studied photography nationally. Her work has received significant national attention, especially her limited-edition fine art Camellia Portraits, her abstracts, which she prints herself in a scroll format on handmade Japanese papers, and more recently, her dahlia prints.
